SPANISH-CUBAN BONDS

The burden of the opposition in Congress to the President's policy of non-recognition of the Cuban insurgents was the assertion that this country would become liable for $400,000,000 of Spanish bonds to the payment of which the Spanish lawyers like ex-Attorney General means committee expect to complete Wayne MacVesgh, ex-Senator Ed-munds, ex-Secretary of State Foster mittee today or tomorrow at the To the front then, ye men of America, and the Hon. Nor is the question of our responsibility established by the act of recognition lows that act. Had Cuban independence been achieved by peaceful mediation the subject of validating the bonds in whole or in part by the Cuban republic or by the guarantee of the United States would doubtless have been considered in the negotiations, but diplomacy having failed by reason of the uncompromising atti tude of Spain, and war being thereby precipitated, she has risked both her sovereignty and her bonds in the arbitrament of arms, and they must abide the result. The bondholders seem to have contemplated such a contingency, for they required not only the pledge of the customs revenue of Cuba, but also the guarantee of the Spanish government.
